

Biography

Dylan Boyle had the luck to be raised in Colorado and Hawaii, before finding his permanent home in Montana. Growing up around the tourism industry, Dylan took his passion for special places into his education, holding an undergraduate marketing degree with an emphasis in sustainable tourism, along with a master's degree in recreation management from The College of Forestry and Conservation at The University of Montana. He currently leads the National Geographic Co-Branded Crown of the Continent Geotourism Project, where he oversees the day to day operations. He is also a member of the executive committee of The National Geotourism Council, which represents the eight current geotourism projects in the United States and Canada at the federal level. In 2011, Dylan founded Geotravel Consulting, LLC, specializing in community education on responsible and authentic travel, based in the Crown of the Continent. In his spare time, Dylan can be found skiing, backpacking, or fly-fishing around the headwaters of the North American continent.
